Why Would an Employer Want to Offer an Employee Assistance Program?

→ Significant Return on Investment (ROI)

For every $1.00 spent on an EAP, an organization sees between $6.00 – $10.00 ROI, according to a study from Morneau Shepell. Likewise, Arete HR Inc. provides a similar evaluation of an EAP's ROI, proving once and for all that EAPs are well worth the investment.

→ Attract and Retain Top Talent

Employees are looking at prospective employers' benefits plans more than ever before, which means to attract and retain the best employees, your benefits plan needs to be up to snuff. With the ongoing mental health crisis in the world (made worse by the aftermath of the COVID-19 pandemic), mental health support and resources is top on the minds of many employees right now.

→ Reduced Absenteeism, Presenteeism, and Disability Claims

Better mental health outcomes have been proven to reduce absenteeism and presenteeism (the cost of employees being at work but not being productive). What's more, mental health claims now account for 70% of total disability costs in countries like Canada – that's a significant number, especially considering the costly nature of disability claims to begin with. Supporting employees' mental health can decrease the likelihood of costly disability claims.

→ Increased Productivity and Job Satisfaction

Happier, healthier employees are more productive, engaged, and report greater job satisfaction. All of that translates into greater results for you and your business, not to mention a more positive experience for employees and your customers.
